The negotiations were for 16 of the lots he owns and not for all his properties at Lauren's Bay.

Assistant city manager Braxton Copley said this would just refinance the approximately $703,591 in future special assessments Klausman owes and spread them out over the next 20 years.

"We are simply refinancing the future specials using the CID as the tool for that," Copley said.

When asked by Councilwoman Christina Valdivia-Alcalá, Copley said the CID typically is used for businesses and not residential.

Council members David Banks and Valdivia-Alcalá voted against the CID.

One public comment in favor of Jim Klausman's CID and one against.

During the public hearing, Danielle Twemlow read out loud an article from The Capital-Journal from a decade ago that critiqued the special assessment process and the funding granted to Lauren's Bay.

"We can keep saying the same things over and over again and the points have continued to be made but I do believe that it's important again to point out this is public record now — that many of these home that are there now have been paying the specials since 2015," Twemlow said. "While they are somewhat a bit lower that's also a nuanced thing."

She said Topeka has made progress in the past 10 years without Klausman's Lauren's Bay development.

"So, that 'but for' analysis stating that this would not happen but for this investment, we know that is also untrue," Twemlow said. "This is just simply a choice. We have many, many other houses that have been developed on that property and that area. We have had this developer purchase up millions of dollars worth of other buildings since this has taken place."

Mayoral candidate Henry McClure spoke in favor of the CID during public comment.

"There's no reason not to stop this today," McClure said. "And nobody up there should say, 'our money. It's our money.' Those bonds are current, we've been paying the bonds and forget about it. That's old money. Quit trying to make that money back. You're not in the real estate business. The only way you make the money back is by getting houses on their paying taxes. So, I hope you all support it."

try it again," Marisa Bermudez said.

Elvira Bermudez said she's doing new events outside of her brick-and-mortar store to spread the word about her business and give people the opportunity to try the sweet treats she offers.

How will you know what vendors will be at Munch Market?

To know which food trucks and vendors will be at Munch Market every First Friday, Concepcion encourages people to use the Mobile Munch application.

Users can download the Mobile Munch app, tap the Market icon, and check out the lineup of food vendors.

The app works by allowing area food truck owners to provide information regarding upcoming dates, times, locations, menu options and pricing for their businesses, The Capital-Journal previously reported.

In addition to Antojitos Bermudez and Los GemElotes setting up at the April 4 Munch Market, Conchis Cuisine and La Casa De Los Abuelos were also Concepcion said his team is working to bring a more diverse food scene for upcoming Munch Markets at First Fridays. He said they hope to bring in a creole food-based vendor as well as an Indian food-based one.

"We want to bring new initiatives to NOTO and to be completely honest, make first Fridays the place to be," Concepcion said. "My idea and hope is that we get more vendors so we can have different types of cuisines."

Funding

"We disagree with this decision and recognize the importance of child care providers," Stanek said. "Unfortunately, without this federal funding in place, KDHE cannot sustain the costs of waiving these fees. The decision by the Trump administration to defund this initiative means that we have no choice but to reinstate the child care licensing and background check fees effective immediately."

Kansas had waived child care licensing fees

The move comes after the governor announced in September that the state was using federal funding to cover fees for licensing, background checks and fingerprinting for new and existing child care providers. The money came from excess federal funds and was going to be used to waive fees through 2025, or until funds were used up.

"I'm committed to expanding access to affordable, high-quality child care opportunities for Kansas children and families," Kelly said at the time. "These funds allow for continued support for child care providers by removing financial barriers.'

The state had already been covering licensing fee costs since 2021 using discretionary federal funding from pandemic relief, and the state later used reallocated funding that was also from COVID-19 aid.

Stanek had said at the time the money "will go a long way in allowing potential and current child care providers to continue the important work of creating and sustaining quality child care options for Kansas families."

How much do government fees cost child care?

The state had hoped that waiving the fees would lower the start-up cost amid a child care shortage while also incentivizing unlicensed providers to get licensed.

Fee amounts can vary, depending on the type of license and who does the background check and fingerprinting.

A family child care home has a $85 state licensing fee, while a child care center has a fee of $75 plus $1 for each child. Preschools have varying levels of fee with a max of $75, while school-age programs and drop-in programs have $20 fees. There may also be local fees on top of the state fees.

Background checks are required by both federal rule and state law for anyone living, working or volunteering at a day care. The current fee for fingerprint background checks are $58 for most staff and $7 for supervised volunteers and certain other roles.

What governor and KDHE say about funding cut

The governor's office was critical of the federal funding cut.

"The Trump Administration's decision to cut funding covering state licensing, background check, and fingerprinting fees for child care providers will directly harm Kansas children and families," said Grace Hoge, a spokesperson for the governor. "Governor Kelly championed this commonsense policy to break down financial barriers for child care providers setting up shop in Kansas. Stripping this funding places additional obstacles in front of Kansas families needing access to affordable, high-quality child care."

KDHE spokesperson Jill Bronaugh told The Capital-Journal the agency had used covered fees for thousands of providers over the past three and a half vears

"Child care providers are critical to Kansas families, communities, and our state's economy," Bronaugh said. 'Since September 2021, KDHE has been able to cover the license application fees for 15,573 child care providers for a savings of $1.43 million through congressionally approved federal funding, as well as state funding in 2024. We have also been able to cover the cost of 39,422 background checks for a provider savings of $1.91 million through this same funding."

She said the state "had no choice but to reinstate" the fees immediately.

'While we plan to appeal this decision, until we hear otherwise, we must move forward with reinstating the fees," Bronaugh said. "This action, taken by the Trump administration, in no way reflects the importance we place on our child care providers throughout the state and the work that they do. We will continue to keep our child care providers informed of future changes or decisions as we become aware of them."

and him as a person, just as a politician, (Trump is) understanding that (you) always lean into being more of who you are," Maher told Cuomo. "The people are not savvy about issues but they smell a phony a mile away. And that kind of (stuff), nobody else does Maher continued: "I've been his biggest critic, for good reason, and when he got reelected I said, 'I'm not going to pre-hate anything.' And in the first week, I said, 'There's lots of things I hate.' Because I do. OK, there's some things I don't hate, also.'

Maher, who said he has "never been a Democrat" but has also "never voted for the Republican" candidate, also denounced critics who "hate Trump."
