Memories from yesteryear

Speakin' Western Lingo
By Ken Miller

Southwest of Dodge City, Kansas, where I grew up, the English language acquired some unique dialect regarding the earliest settlers and their descendants. To this day, generations raised in this geographical area often reflect the idiosyncrasies of this abridged form of the English language.

My father Ray and his twin brother Roy were masters of the language having evolved from the linguistics of the Old West. One example interchanges the “long i” vowel with an “r controlled a” vowel as in the words tired and fire. Examples: “Gosh I’m tared, let’s set by the far” English version: “I’m really tired, let’s sit by the fire.” (Also note the word sit pronounced set.) Another example of an “r” sound misused as in the word Wash: “Warsh your clothes”. Frequently, negatives are verbalized, insinuating a positive communication as stated in, “I’m takin’ my whole bunch t’town, we’re goin’ t’see if we can’t scare up somethin’ t’eat.” English version: “I’m taking my family to the café in town for a good meal.”

The language described in this informative story also dictates the use of eliminating the word “would” by simply adding a “d” to the associated noun. The following is an example of this technique: “Then the teacher’d get up and say, John was the most misunderstood man in the country!” Two other common practices include bypassing the word “to”, instead, using a shortcut and in other English vocabulary, dropping the letter “g” in words ending with “ing”. “He’s just bein’ nice so don’t start talkin’ purty t’em!”

Another interesting quirk of the language is the use of grammar combined with what is sometimes, in western lingo, called “word averaging.” A good example of this is, “Have you eaten yet?” A so called, western proper vernacular is, “Did you eat yet?” However, with word averaging, this question is shortened to, “G’eat yet?” while in areas of northern Kansas, “Have you eaten yet?” becomes, “Y’eat yet?” An answer in the affirmative using the western lingo is, “Yeah, gew?” (Yes, did you?), while a negative answer is,

“No, gew?” (No, did you?)

If a westerner wants an object placed in the bed of a pickup truck or wagon, he, more than likely, uses the word throw. However, in Southwest vernacular, throw infers varying interpretations regarding the intended object. For instance, common sense tells one a bundle of feed is thrown, a bucket of water placed, a cement block laid, and a board slid into the designated area. In other words, applied common sense is used to enhance effective communication.

Language experts claim if a society is isolated for one hundred years or more, a new language progresses. Indeed, such was and remains to be the case for many descendants of early, western Kansas pioneers. Combining the distinct techniques of this language along with other aspects of the dialogue can be very confusing as well as intriguing, to say the very least, to a “green-horn” listener or foreigner.

Auntie Miller, Uncle Roy’s wife, enlightened me concerning one of their family trips to Minnesota in the 1940’s. With a beam on Auntie’s face, she shared an instance where some neighbors to her sister and brother-in-law in the town of Willmar, Minnesota, were utterly enthralled with Uncle Roy Miller’s accent and willingly stayed up late visiting with him, absorbed in the conversation, largely because they loved to be entertained by his western dialect. My English changed after four years of college with professors and students from other fragments of the country and from having lived and taught in various parts of the state. Every time I return to my roots, though, it takes only a few minutes to pick up on the dialect and converse as if I had never left.

Yet, when visiting different areas of Kansas and other countries of the world, I occasionally feel uncomfortable when speaking this western lingo. My brother, George, moved to Sweden twenty years ago where many natives pride themselves speaking proficient English. When communicating with the Swedes, he and I sometimes have fun reverting to an exaggerated example of Western English. Even some of the very skilled English linguists appear clueless regarding our conversation, looking at us like, “What did you just say?” (There were times nobody’d ever question what I wuz tryin’ t’ say, but other times I’d find myself tryin’ t’ thinka’ jus’ the right words ‘n bent on pronounce’n ‘m, usin’ purcise English.)

I’m a 1963 graduate of Moscow High School, Moscow, Kansas and grew up with the Hermes.

My family has been living in Stevens County since 1886. I am the fourth generation of Millers there.

This is a story from a book I have written but not published yet.

A big Thank You to Mr. Ken Miller for sharing these articles with The Hermes and all of our readers!

“God was certainly riding along in his cab” was stated by an observer at Rex Coulter’s accident scene Wednesday. The Stevens County farmer was approaching a railroad track at Feterita when a train caught the corner of his thirty foot drill. It broke the 4640 John Deere tractor in half, crushed the cab, and mangled everything into a ball. Amazingly, Coulter suffered not a scratch and appeared to have escaped without suffering shock as well.
