HOLY COW! HISTORY

America's first viral 'fake news' moment

BY J. MARK POWELL
InsideSources.com

Powell

We hear a lot these days about "fake news," but it's not a new complaint. In fact, one wartime reporting blunder hit America like a bombshell. Here's the story.
Mankind had never seen anything like World War I. It featured brand-new horrors such as poison gas, bombs dropped from the sky, tanks and machine guns. More than 70 million people from 32 countries fought, and 17 million died. An additional 20 million were wounded.
Folks desperately wanted the war to end. When November 1918 arrived, it seemed peace was finally within sight.
Which is where Roy Howard enters the story. He was the president of United Press (later United Press International), a news service locked in fierce competition with rival The Associated Press.

With the war winding down, Howard was in Brest, France, on Nov. 7, meeting with Adm. Henry Wilson, the commander of American naval forces there.
Exactly what happened next is fuzzy. Wilson had just received word (either by telegram or phone) from a friend at the American Embassy in Paris that an armistice had been signed that morning. The war was over!
Journalists spend their entire career waiting for a scoop that big. And Howard had it all to himself.

He asked Wilson if it was OK to report the news. Sure, the admiral said.
Howard sped off to the nearest telegraph office, where he violated UP's rules. All dispatches coming from France were to be signed by Howard and William Simms, UP's foreign editor. But Simms was 375 miles away in Paris. Waiting to reach him would jeopardize the exclusive.
So Howard simply forged Simms' signature and sent these words:
"URGENT – ARMISTICE ALLIES SIGNED ELEVEN [this morning] — HOSTILITIES CEASED TWO [this afternoon] HOWARD-SIMMS."
The news hit New York like a bomb. Wall Street suspended trading at 1 p.m. Stores closed, with one merchant posting in his window, "Too happy to work. Come back tomorrow!" Traffic stopped as crowded streets turned into impromptu block parties. And of course, alcohol flowed very, very freely.

The word Americans, and all people the world over, had longed to hear was finally being said. Peace.
Except it wasn't. Across the Atlantic, the war still raged in France. Adm. Wilson's friend had merely passed along a rumor. And Howard hadn't bothered to confirm it.
When the news reached Washington, Secretary of State Robert Lansing practically tripped over himself issuing a denial. It hit the wires at 2:15 p.m.
However, the people rejected it. They clung to what they wanted to believe, that the war was indeed over, and they weren't going to let anyone take it away from them. Angry mobs destroyed copies of newspapers that ran the denial and even briefly attacked the Associated Press' New York office when it couldn't confirm an armistice.

Celebrations lasted all night across the country.
Yet, by the next morning, there could be no disputing it. Men were still fighting and dying in the trenches. The UP had got it wrong.
The New York Times called it "the most flagrant and culpable act of public deception" in the history of journalism. The New York Evening Sun gloated that it hadn't reported the "fake news" as fact.
The armistice was actually signed a few days later, "on the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month."
With the war really and truly over, Americans did it all over again. The so-called "False Armistice" of Nov. 7 had merely been a dress rehearsal for the real thing on the 11th.

As for Roy Howard, he wiped the egg off his face and soldiered on. He headed the E.W. Scripps Company in 1920, which later became the Scripps-Howard newspaper and broadcasting chain. He even interviewed Josef Stalin in the Kremlin in 1936. Yet, when Howard retired in 1953, his big mistake from 35 years earlier still haunted him. And always did.
"Fake news" has been around a long time. It will likely still exist a long time from now, too. And that's a fact.

ASKING ERIC

Life-long friends stop sharing life's trials

BY R. ERIC THOMAS
Tribune Content Agency

Dear Eric: I have a few longtime friends. After four years of caretaking, my mom passed away from dementia. After that, I had to arrange for the selling of furnishings and the house. My 65-year-old brother who shared the house with her has cerebral palsy and required round-the-clock care. So, I had to arrange all that.
During this approximately 18-month period, one friend went through and survived breast cancer and another lost her life to a brain tumor. Sadly, none of the other friends ever let me know about these sweet friends.

I know I can't feel guilty about what I didn't know about, but I feel like I needed support and still do as I mourn.
Am I so easily forgettable to not be included in these lifelong friends' trials? I feel terribly inconsequential. The guilt I feel is becoming burdensome.

How do I move forward? They don't include me now in anything. I know I was preoccupied, but it was with good reason.
– Feeling Lost
Dear Lost: I'm so sorry. To experience this kind of social loss after the loss of your mother and your friends is terrible. I'm curious if you've been able to talk to your friends about what shifted in your relationship and how you feel about it. It's totally understandable if you haven't had the capacity to hash it out. But some part of this may be due to miscommunication. I wonder if your friends have pulled back on updating you on hard news or their plans because they fear becoming burdens to you. Of course, other explanations are possible. But it's possible they're going too far in an attempt to be sensitive to your needs.

Talk to them one-on-one about where you are, where you feel your relationship is, and what you'd like to be different. You may be surprised by what you hear from them, and they may be surprised by what you share.
